Axl Rose has led something of an impulsive life, but thus far he seems to have stuck with more or less the same watch brands – watch brands that are surprisingly low key (well, much more so than I would have expected given his famous temperament and fashion choices): Audemars Piguet and Breitling.

The Breitling is perhaps less surprising as band mate Slash also tends to favor Breiling; I have spotted the virtuoso guitarist wearing several models by the Swiss brand on stage over the years.

But now Rose comes out with something horological that he has the opportunity to make all his own: a collaboration with boutique watch brand HYT, which is famous for its groundbreaking use of liquid as the time-telling display.

At recent European dates with AC/DC – the 54-year-old GnR front man has been filling in for Brian Johnson, who had to suddenly step down from the stage due to hearing issues – Rose was spotted wearing the HYT Skull Maori model, which retails for $120,000. Now HYT announces Rose as a new “friend of the brand.” The Skull Maori he is currently sporting is a loaner, which he will wear on stage (and hopefully elsewhere) until he receives his own limited edition HYT timepiece based on the Skull line, which CEO Vincent Perriard estimates as arriving in January 2017.
